with great caution. Seisthograph crews are highy paid, the equipment is expensive and competition is tough. All this makes the maps costly.

Sometimes the maps are valuable only to the company that made them.

LEGAL TENDER

Other times they are almost legal tender in oil circles. So, many companies take no chances and keep the maps in vaults that can be entered only by trusted employees.

But the maps get out anyway.

But the maps get out anyway.

Sometimes romance is involved, as in the case of some bootleg maps several years ago.

The bootleger found out which executive of the big company had most access to the maps. He knew the man was honest and would make no deals.

But the executive had a pretty secretary. The bootleger gether her the rush.

Soon he convinced her they would make a good partners both in romance and business. They would set in ners both in romaince and business. They would set up their own oil company, he proposed, and make a success of it because of her brains. But first he had a problem, he told her. He wasn't quite sure what format to use for the oil maps they would need. He suggested she samuggle out a few maps from her has a become and the statement of the second of t

She took some from the executive's desk. The maps were back before anyone missed them. But the bootlegger made copies.

ger made copies.
The maps appeared on the under-the-counter market.
The partnership never came about.
The culprit was never convicted because under the old law it was up to the state to prove the maps were worth anything. And he wasn't dealing in storen property, only pictures.

"You can't convict a man of stealing a chicken just because he has a picture of the chicken," an assistant district attorney said before the new law was passed.

The sale price of under-the-counter oil maps varies, depending on the location mapped and the demand for information.

Some have brought as much as $300,000, one oil man said. A private detective working on the recent case said he bought several copies of maps at about $150 each.

CRAFTY BOOTLEGGERS

CRAFTY BOOTLEGGERS

The methods used to get the maps in the recent case have not been made public.

But map bootleggers in the past have been crafty.

One company, taking all the usual precautions of locked vaults and passwords, sent a trusted employee with its maps everytime they were to be copied for the company's own use.

He made sure the originals got back into the vault the copies to the desks of the executives wanting them. He

By CHARLES GREEN

HOUSTON, Tex, Aug 12 (AP)—An executive left the office of a small oil company in Houston, his briefcase lighter and his billioid heavier than when he entered. The executive had just made a deal that could involve millions of dollars. But they would be blackmarket dollars.

He arranged to sell oil maps—pieces of paper showing possible oil deposits—to the small business: Another company, much larger, had spent several hundred thousand dollars just to have the maps made. But somehow the majs got into the wrong hands. Copies were made and the maps returned to a guarded vault before the large company knew they were missing
