V's Diller Finds Painless Way to Watch It... Turn Sound Off

WOOD, Aug. 14 Right. Well, my husband Diller, the king of guy who turns me good on everything the minute he has a painless gets up, he turns on the TV for watching TV, and turn the sound off so the kudos on the draw should see things the V set. You things in the afternoons?"

"With you?"

"So, to save time, I've got to run around turning these darn things off. But one morning I didn't turn the TV on because I think I'm not for the show. Finally, after seven months, they call me and I cowboy hit the dust without hearing a shot! Try it, it's funnyville. Will you me?"

"I go back to New York and work at the Blue Angel." "With you?"

"For a dame with hardly it's my brain's work. But my husband and my kids thought I was a howl, so just for laughs six years ago, I auditioned at the Purple Onion in San Francisco and stayed 89 weeks. You want more?"

"About a paragraph?"

"I know exactly where I fit in this business, but I've got a long way to go. I'm going to write books, do a

TV series, star in a broadway show and even paint."

"How do you know you can do all this?"

as a "passer." That's a person who can pass back and forth between the Paar and Sullivan show without getting lost on the way. Now you want to know the secret of my success? Right?"

"You tried?"

"No. All I've done is put my true self on stage. I was like that at home. I had very little hair then, too. It's low blood pressure that causes it. I'm lucky my brains work. But my husband and my kids thought I was a howl, so just for laughs six years ago, I auditioned at the Purple Onion in San Francisco and stayed 89 weeks. You want more?"

The new order, apparently, is spelling the aim of all.

Fuller, it should be noted, reflects a popular Hollywood viewpoint but one rarely seen in print.

The official position of the three major networks, really scared by high level condemnation of TV for its violence, appears to be one of never admitting excessive violence but promising to mend their ways.

"I think Westerns are the only real escapist entertainment," Fuller continued. "You can pick up any newspaper and read cops and robbery stuff. You can identify with almost any family in the situation comwringing out cold compresses to help break the fever by killing the villain with a sick—not wounded lead."

omic Development.

Sometimes the maps are valuable only to the company that made them.

LEGAL TENDER

Other times they are almost legal tender in oil circles. So, many companies take no chances and keep the maps in vaults that can be entered only by trusted employees.

But the maps get out anyway.

Sometimes romance is involved, as in the case of some bootleg maps several years ago.

The bootlegger found out which executive of the big company had most access to the maps. He knew the man was honest and would make no deals.

But the executive had a pretty secretary. The bootlegger gave her the rush.

Soon he convinced her they would make a good partners both in romance and business. They would set up their own oil company, he proposed, and make a success of it because of her brains.

But first he had a problem, he told her. He wasn't quite sure what format to use for the oil maps they would need.

He suggested she sing out a few maps from her boss so he could see how the big company did it.

She took some from the executive's desk. But the bootlegger made copies.

The maps appeared on the under-the-counter market. The partnership never came about.

The culprit was never convicted because under the old law it was up to the state to prove the maps were worth anything. And he wasn't dealing in stolen property, only pictures.

"You can't convict a man of stealing a chicken," an assistant district attorney said before the new law was passed.

The sale price of under-the-counter oil maps varies, depending on the location mapped and the demand for information.

Some have brought as much as $300,000, one oil man said. A private detective working on the recent case said he bought several copies of map at about $150 each.

CRAFTY BOOTLEGGERS

The methods used to get the maps in the recent case have not been made public.

But map bootleggers in the past have been crafty.

One company, taking all the usual precautions of locked vaults and passwords, sent a trusted employee with its maps, everything they were to be copied for the company's own use.

He made sure the originals got back into the vault, the copies to the desks of the executives wanting them. He also made sure all imperfect copies were destroyed.

But the blueprint operator had a camera—with telephoto lens—in the ceiling of the blueprint shop.

Everytime he made a copy for himself, he made a copy for himself.

Ex-Isle School Teacher Returns After 30 Years for 11-Day Visit former Kauai and Oahu public school teacher, who left the Islands for the Mainland 30 years ago, returned yesterday on the Matson liner Matsonia for an 11-day visit.

He is Ventnor Williams, now of 3108 Santa Anita, Alameda, California.

Williams, accompanied by his wife, is here to confer with Chin Ho and David Watumull regarding real estate matters in Hawaii.

If plans work out, he said, he will represent Ho and Watumull in Los Angeles where he is a real estate agent.

HYPNOSIS

Williams has been in the real estate business for four years.

Also, for the last 20 years he has been a psychological counselor specializing in scientific hypnosis.

For two years during World War II, he said, he and two Islanders—Johnny Bright and Jimmy (Kekipo) Tye—presented a show, "Hawaii Interpreted," in the Los Angeles area.

He arranged to sell oil maps—pieces of paper showing possible oil deposits—to the small business.

Another company, much larger, had spent several hundred thousand dollars just to have the map made.

But somehow the maps got into the wrong hands.

Copies were made and the maps returned to a guarded vault before the large company knew they were missing.

ONLY A FRACTION

Not long after the transaction, the small company had a lease on land and drilling started.

For only a fraction of the original cost the man had a line on a possible oil field. It could be the break that would set him up for life.

Bootleg oil maps have plagued the oil industry almost since its start.

The man who bought the bootleg maps thought they might be stolen, or copies of maps made at the expense of others, but he closed his eyes to this.

Anything to cut down the chance of failure in the risky business of searching for oil.

Valuable Oil Maps Offer Bootleggers Chance to Get Rich

By CHARLES GREEN

HOUSTON, Tex., Aug. 12 (AP)—An executive left the office of a small oil company in Houston, his briefcase lighter and his billfold heavier than when he entered.

The executive had just made a deal that could involve millions of dollars. But they would be blackmarket dollars.

He arranged to sell oil maps—pieces of paper showing possible oil deposits—to the small business.

Another company, much larger, had spent several hundred thousand dollars just to have the map made.

But somehow the maps got into the wrong hands.

Copies were made and the maps returned to a guarded vault before the large company knew they were missing.
